"blue form" for Signature account holders and up to three of the buyer's competitors, and it's now online: Motions.com, which seeks to "save the planet by simplifying law," has introduced a new e-discovery feature to its legal-advice software called MotionGuru: "We've taken the technical and legal complexity out of e-discovery by combining a visual interface with a new AI-powered search engine." Amigobulls, a "global financial platform for compliance and compliance personnel," has introduced an artificial intelligence-powered search tool called GrowLit: "The technology scans all documents you have stored in the litigation portal's database, considering each word and its context, in order to create a report." – How the rise of artificial intelligence is changing the face of legal technology IDC Research expects that by 2020 the adoption rate of AI technology within legal practice will reach 70 percent. During the past few years, perhaps the most significant development in legal technology has been the introduction of natural-language processing (NLP) and, in particular, machine learning (ML) and AI. The US government currently spends an estimated $27 billion a year on litigation. The savings possible from the use of AI technology have clear implications. – Even though the US government's use of AI technology is more than a decade old, many of the foundational technologies have only now been developed to the point of commercial deployment
